The purpose of the current study was to examine the relationship between body awareness, fear avoidance beliefs, and pain catastrophizing in women with fibromyalgia. One hundred and thirty-eight women with fibromyalgia completed the Adult Fear Avoidance Belief Questionnaire, the Catastrophizing Scale, and a body awareness measure. Study findings suggested that catastrophizing had a direct relationship with the avoidance response and subjective experiences, but was indirectly associated with avoidance response and subjective experiences through fear avoidance beliefs. Body awareness was directly associated with all outcome variables. The effect of catastrophizing was mediated by body awareness and fear avoidance beliefs. The results highlight the importance of pain catastrophizing to fibromyalgia symptomology and suggest that interventions aimed at decreasing catastrophizing may be beneficial for the treatment of fibromyalgia.Bobby Ball Robert N.
